“ Nancy Lair was one of my professors at Indiana University back in 1978-1979. She was a wonderful professor, always finding ways to challenge us and make us better reference librarians. I've thought of her often since then, frequently remembering something she taught me or just remembering what a kind, wonderful person she was.

“ I had Nancy as a teacher at Library School, and was blessed to later have her as a friend. I loved most of all sitting together with her and our cups of tea and listening to her share stories of her youth in the Southeastern U.S. when coal and timber reigned as kings. She was a special lady. Margaret Harter

“ Ohmygosh. Nancy Lair was one of the sweetest, kindest people I've had the pleasure to know. She was patient with me and amused by my shenanigans when I was running around, doing library school, studying trumpet, and enjoying the beautiful city

“ Nancy was a wonderful storyteller and a great writer. Her stories of growing up in West Virginia were fascinating, and I hope they will be published. She enriched our writing group with her stories, her lovely sense of humor and her gentle commentary. We will all miss her.

“ Nancy’s enthusiasm for life showed in everything she did. Her love of a good story combined with her commitment to preparing future librarians, making her one of the best-loved faculty members in the School of Library and Information Science. One consequence of her valuing each student’s potential was that so many of them asked her for letters of reference; she was no doubt instrumental in many librarians getting their first professional positions. Nancy had the smallest office space on “faculty row” and her desk was always smothered in small pieces of paper – evidence of her famous saying, “I’ll just make a note of that.”

Nancy’s appreciation for the gifts that each of us brings was evident in her support and understanding for animals, too. She regaled generations of SLIS-ards with stories of the goats she and John raised and she always had a soft spot for the dog or cat in need. Her adoption of Jazz, the cat that the animal shelter had despaired of placing, is just one example.

We will miss Nancy’s gifts as a storyteller and liver of life. Her smile and enthusiasm have meant so much to so many.
